3 Oct	Six Sons and a Seismograph	Glenn Vallender
	Thanks to George Hogben and his colleagues, NZ was one of the first countries in the world to purchase a standardised seismograph in 1897 and begin a systematic instrumental study of earthquakes. The hero of this story is the first rector of Timaru Boys' High School, George Hogben CMG. MA. Although a short life, his life is full of triumph and tragedy but central to the early history of seismology in NZ.
10 Oct	Navigating Fake News	Stephen Davis
	This is a chance to join the battle against fake news and help save democracy. How do you know what online sources to trust? How do you develop your own good sources? Do you understand the many ways the internet is giving you false information? What is the difference between 'mis' and disinformation? (Please bring pen and paper for a short quiz.)
17 Oct	The Ethics (or not) of Marketing to Children	Professor Robert Aitken
	There is widespread concern about the implications of marketing to children and the consequences of its promotion of values of consumerism and overconsumption in negatively affecting children's wellbeing and psychological development. However, despite the ubiquitous presence of marketing in children's environments, children's actual exposure to the full range of marketing across all media and in multiple settings remains unknown. This presentation reports on an innovative method of analysis, using data from wearable automated cameras, to objectively document children's marketing exposure across and within settings.
